In Residence

Landscape is the work of the mind.

Steven Sondheim’s Los Angeles home, built by Charles Moore, is the subject of Architectural Digest’s December issue, which is dedicated to landscape architecture and design.

The house, which was completed in 1966, is a perfect example of the assertion that landscape design is as much about the creation of an outdoor space as it is about the creation of an indoor one. The house is surrounded by a series of interconnected gardens, each with its own character and purpose, that function as extensions of the interior space.

One of the most striking features of the house is its use of water as a design element. The swimming pool, which is located in the center of the home, acts as a focal point for the garden, and its water feature includes a small waterfall that cascades down into a pond.

The garden itself is a carefully designed space that includes a mix of plants and trees, as well as a variety of outdoor furniture. The garden is designed to be both a place for relaxation and a place for socializing, with seating areas and areas for dining.

The house also features a series of outdoor rooms, each with its own fireplace and a series of windows that open onto the garden. These spaces are designed to be used as extensions of the interior, allowing for a seamless transition between indoor and outdoor.

The garden is also designed to be a place of discovery, with hidden pathways and secret nooks that encourage exploration. The garden is also designed to be a place of refuge, with secluded seating areas that are away from the main house.
